IDEAL SCHOOL

TWENTIETH

Should embody all the great educational advances that have been made within the last few years; it should be located where it may have the many health-giving advantages of the country; the buildings should be ample, well planned and fully equipped; the boys should have access. under the guidance of a trained gymnast and athlete, to a well-equipped gymnasium and to ample athletic grounds; the instruction should combine the thorough and conservative methods of the old-time training with the most progressive educational ideas; the classes should be small enough to permit the individual needs and peculiarities of each pupil to be carefully studied, yet large enough to insure the stimulus of classroom competition; the teachers should possess maturity and experience, yet they should not be so old as to be out of sympathy with their pupils; the same careful oversight should be given to manners and morals as to studies; the boy should be taught to be a gentleman by being treated as one. In a word, the twentieth century school should not be a factory for turning out "graduates," but a laboratory for the careful study and the actual development of the best that is in each pupil. Such were the aims of

The Washington School for Boys.

In its work it is hampered by no old buildings, old equipment or old conventions of teaching. It embodies the best results of the great progress that has recently been made in all departments of education. From the start it has received the hearty aid and support of the highest authorities in education, and of leaders in business and professional life.
